Nonprofit public service organizations play a unique and vital role in the growth and development of the Greater Kansas City metropolitan region. These organizations are integral to the region's economy, and they are central to the overall health of the community. Therefore, each year the Midwest Center for Nonprofit Leadership organizes and analyzes data from multiple sources (including the IRS and the Census Bureau) to track and document the size and scope of the region's sector and its growth and development. This Sector at a Glance Report presents a few highlights from the current year's research.

The Kansas City's charitable nonprofit sector demonstrated a decline in the total number of organizations but an increase in total revenue. This year, there are 7,403 Kansas City charitable nonprofit organizations (501c3s) registered with the IRS, a decrease of 209 (or approximately 2.8%). About forty-four percent of these organizations, or 3,257, have revenues of at least $25,000 per year (this is an increase of 13 over last year). In addition, there are an estimated 1,552 religious congregations operating in the Greater Kansas City metro region. Despite the decline in size the Kansas City nonprofit sector increased its overall sector revenue with approximately two billion dollars; the nonprofit sector now comprises about 15.3% of the region's economy, up from 14.4 % last year. A detailed report on the topics of this summary, including trend information on the sector plus highlights from the most current report on Kansas City nonprofit wages and benefits, is available on the Midwest Center's website (www.mcnl.org).

The Nonprofit Share of the Kansas City Economy

- The nonprofit sector (excluding congregations) comprises 3.6 percent of the total number of Kansas City organizations, yet it generates almost nine percent of total revenue for the region's economy (see figure 1 below). As the nonprofit economic activity increased from 2007 the share of Kansas City's estimated Gross Metropolitan Product (GMP) also increased with 0.93%..

How Kansas City's Nonprofit Sector Compares

- Kansas City's nonprofit organization population is comparable to that of other similarly-sized U.S. metropolitan areas. It has an average number of nonprofits for its population, although the assets and revenues of these organizations average significantly less than the assets of many comparable cities. While St. Louis and Minneapolis showed decreased revenues compared to 2007; most others showed marked growth.

Nonprofit Mission and Market

- The charts below illustrate the distribution of missions and resources for various types of nonprofits in Greater Kansas City metropolitan region. Revenues and numbers of organizations for each mission area vary significantly. For example, human service organizations comprise a quarter of all Kansas City charitable organizations that file with the IRS, yet they receive only twelve percent of the revenues. Health organizations comprise only ten percent of the agencies, yet they account for 45 percent of all revenues received by the city's sector (up from 37% in 2007). Conversely, nonprofits in the arts and culture mission area comprise eight percent of all agencies, yet secured only about three percent of resources (no change from 2007).

Foundations and Philanthropy

- Kansas City has a strong foundation community that exhibits an exceptional record of giving, including one of the most successful community foundations in the nation (Greater Kansas City Community Foundation). Just over 22 percent of all Missouri and Kansas foundations are based in the Kansas City metro region, yet these foundations hold more than 52 percent of all foundation assets and comprise more than 51 percent of all foundation giving for the two states combined.
